

Assignment 2: Little Red Riding Hood Spot News Practice

Man Tsz Shan 22467661

A Little Girl and Her Grandmother Survived Double Wolf Attacks in One Week

For the second time this week, a little girl and her grandmother faced a wolf attack in the woods. Luckily, both were safe after the two incidents.

Yesterday, a little girl called Little Red Riding Hood and her grandmother successfully escaped from a second wolf attack, following a previous encounter that took place three days ago.

The day before, Little Red Riding Hood visited her grandmother who lived in a cottage deep in the woods. On her way, she encountered a suspicious wolf but remained vigilant. After arriving at her grandmother's home, Little Red Riding Hood alerted her grandmother of the encounter with the wolf. "The wolf followed me to my grandmother's home. He tried to mimic my voice to lure us into opening the door. We did not fall for his trick," said Little Red Riding Hood.

Aware of the cunning wolf's tricks, Little Red Riding Hood and her grandmother came up with a plan to save themselves. "The wolf circled the house and then jumped on the roof, planning to attack us in the dark," said the grandmother. "We used the scent of sausages to trick him." The wolf, lured by the smell, lost its balance on the roof and fell into a trough, downing itself. No one was injured in the incident.

Three days ago, Little Red Riding Hood visited her sick grandmother and encountered another wolf on the same route. She was tricked by the wolf into disclosing where her grandmother lived. The wolf went to the grandmother's house, swallowed her, and dressed up in her clothes to wait for Little Red Riding Hood.

"I could sense something was wrong when I entered the cottage," said Little Red Riding Hood. "The door was wide open, but I received no answer when I called out for my grandmother."

Little Red Riding Hood saw her grandmother lying on the bed and noticed she looked different, with unusually large ears, eyes, hands, and mouth. The wolf, having dressed in the grandmother's nightclothes to disguise himself, tried to deceive the little girl. However, his ruse quickly failed as Little Red Riding Hood noticed his awkward appearance. He then jumped out of bed and swallowed the girl.

Fortunately, a huntsman passing by the cottage heard loud snores and went to investigate. Inside, he discovered the sleeping wolf, cut open its belly, and rescued Little Red Riding Hood and her grandmother.

“The grandmother could barely breathe when she was brought out,” the huntsman said. “We then filled the wolf’s belly with heavy stones while he was still sleeping.” When the wolf awoke and tried to flee, he immediately collapsed and died on the spot.

Little Red Riding Hood and her grandmother successfully avoided two separate wolf attacks in one week.